Excerpt from Portland State Magazine -

ONE NIGHT, Pimentel and Honeyman went out for a midnight snack at the Pancake House, one of their favorite spots. The regular waitress had been replaced by one they'd never met.

"This waitress had never seen Art or anyone like him; she just stared," Pimentel recalls. "Finally, she said, 'I can't believe that something like you would come someplace where people are trying to eat. I won't serve you because I don't even know if you're a human being.'"

"And she ended by saying, 'I thought people like you were supposed to die at birth.'"

"I was stunned; I didn't know what to say. And Art turned to me and said, 'Why is the waitress talking about you this way? I don't think you look any worse than you usually do.'"

By sunrise, the two were in jail under the "Ugly Law," which until the mid-1970s allowed the arrest of anyone in public who was considered so "maimed, mutilated or diseased" that their appearance was upsetting.

"At one time I wanted to be the youngest corporate vice president in America," Pimentel says. "But with that incident I became intolerant of discrimination."

Pimentel approached Leonard Cain, professor of sociology. "I asked him, how do I fix this?" Dr. Cain said, "You can mobilize the disability community, but only if they know they are a community."

"At that point I switched from debate to sociology."

The movie follows Richard's life from an abused child, to deaf war veteran, to Portland State University student who befriends Art Honeyman, a young man with a wicked wit and a genius IQ, who also happens to have cerebral palsy. Together they become instrumental in the passing of the Americans with Disabilities Act, (ADA) of 1990. Richard is also the primary author of "Tilting at Windmills," an interactive disability attitude training program designed for managers, created the first training program on "Developing Jobs for Persons with Disabilities," trained the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, (EEOC), staff on Windmills, and co-authored, "Perspectives; Aids in the Workplace" & the "ADA Workers Compensation Connection."

"Music Within" received numerous awards and great reviews from the likes of Roger Ebert and Larry King.
